DARK ALLEY

OSCAR couldn't look at Margie. He looked down at his toes and wiggled them experimentally. He knew that Margie was looking directly at him.

"If you would only stop talking about the way you pitch horseshoes," Margie told him, "then perhaps we could go somewhere with another couple without being laughed at all evening."

"I don't see anything to laugh at," Oscar said to his shoes, "pitching horseshoes takes the same skill as any other game. Just because the school doesn't hand out letters for it doesn't mean it isn't a skilled sport."

"But can't you do me a little favor?" Margie asked as she got up and began to pace the floor nervously. "We're going out Saturday night with Liz and Bob, so for my sake, please don't mention anything about pitching horseshoes."

"Don't see why not," Oscar reasoned, "Bob talks about football all night!"

"But Bob is the captain of the team!"

"If we had a team for pitching horseshoes . . ."

"I know, I know . . ." Margie said impatiently, "you'd be captain, but for my sake, please—no talk of pitching horseshoes."

"I'll tell you what I'll do," Oscar spoke slowly, "I won't talk about pitching horseshoes if Bob won't talk about football!"

Margie fell back hard on the couch and murmured, "I give up . . . I GIVE UP!"

. . . "If that worm just opens his mouth about a horseshoe, I'll make him swallow a football." Bob squared his large shoulders and looked directly at Liz. "I mean there's no reason for us to listen to that sort of—of—kid stuff!"

"Try to be reasonable, Bob," Liz sipped her soda slowly, "after all his sport is just as important to him as football is to you."

"You're joking!" Bob looked at Liz as if he had seen her for the first time. "How can you compare a game like football to pitching horseshoes?" He gasped at the thought. "It's—it's—fantastic!"

"Not to Oscar, it isn't. He's serious about the game." Liz turned and faced Bob. "Margie and I have been friends for a long time, and we don't want to break up now, especially over something as silly as horseshoes!"

"It's not my game," Bob sulked, "I don't play or talk about it."

"Promise me one thing," Liz asked, "if Oscar does say anything about his game, you won't make fun of him."

Bob was very thoughtful. "All right," he agreed. "I'll tell you what I'll do. If Oscar doesn't bring up the subject of horseshoes, neither will I!"

"That's very kind of you," Liz said hopelessly, "very kind."

. . . It was Saturday night. Oscar turned down an alley on his way to Margie's house. He kept telling himself he did it because it was a short cut, but deep inside he seemed to feel the real reason for it was his fear of meeting Bob before he got to the house. He had given his word, and he meant to keep it. At least long enough to wait until the girls were around.

The alley was dark, but Oscar repeated to himself over and over again that he was not afraid. He had heard of some juvenile delinquents who were using the alley as a place to hold up the unwary passerby who was foolish enough to use it as a short cut

No one would hold him up, Oscar reasoned. After all, he did not look prosperous even though he did have some money with him. His date money. He had just convinced himself that he was the last one in the world likely to be held up when out of the darkness he felt something hard pressed into his back, and a young voice snarled, "Freeze where you are! And keep quiet!"

. . . Bob looked at his watch and he knew it was late even before he saw its face. He had purposely waited this long before starting out because if there was one thing that he didn't want to do that was to meet Oscar before he got to Margie's house.

He could take the short cut if he wanted to, Bob reasoned, but his watch told him it was no longer a matter of choice. He turned down the dark alley, almost at a dog trot. As it got darker he trotted faster. He kept telling himself that he was going faster only because it was so late.

Just how or just where along the way he collided with some one, he didn't know. Somehow the alley was obstructed, and his momentum carried him forward so quickly that he was off balance when he hit. Whoever it was went crashing to the ground, as Bob, off balance, crashed into a rain barrel. The rotted wood splintered as the freed hoops clanged, and the echoes bounced in the dark alley. Bob muttered a "Pardon me," that was lost in the noise, but evidently heard by someone who shouted, "Bob! He's getting away with my money!"

Bob scrambled to his feet. It was Oscar! He groped for a barrel stave, and his hand came into contact with a hoop. Bob picked it up hastily and threw it at the running figure. It was at about that time that Oscar took a deep breath, closed his eyes and flung himself at the running figure in what he imagined to be a flying tackle. He missed as badly as Bob's hoop.

This was crazy, Bob thought as he ran wildly down the alley. Oscar was doing the tackling, and he didn't know how to tackle, and Bob was throwing the hoop, and for the first time, he noticed that there was a certain amount of skill required in tossing something like that which he knew nothing about.

"The hoop!" shouted Bob as he passed Oscar who sat in a dazed position on the cement walk. "The hoop!" Bob hoped that Oscar would realize what he was trying to tell him. He was trying to conserve his wind for if the figure he was gaining upon would round the corner at the end of the alley, he would escape. The hoop lay near Oscar, and Bob hoped he would know enough to use it, and use it right!

Something swished over Bob's head, and he didn't have to look up. He had an idea what it was, and kept his eyes glued to the fleeing figure. A round metal piece floated in the air above the dark silhouette as he neared the corner, and settled down neatly over his shoulders. The would-be thief slowed down almost to a walk as he tried to untangle himself from the ring of steel that encircled his arms. He was nearing the end of the alley, and once reaching the street he could lose his pursuers in the crowded street. He struggled with it as Bob came ever closer.

Bob measured the distance with his practiced eye and threw himself forward catching the hooped individual in a flying tackle.

Oscar was soon at his side, as Bob sat on a culprit who lay quite still with his wind gone.

"Good throw, Oscar," Bob complimented.

"Nicest tackle I ever saw," Oscar puffed.

. . . Margie heard the door bell and she hoped that both boys were at the door, and yet she dreaded the thought that they had met before the girls could intervene and keep the conversation from getting hostile. Liz went with her to the front door, both with a feeling of dread.

"Remember," Margie reminded Liz, "if they start to talk about their sports, we change the conversation!"

"Right," agreed Liz.

Margie opened the door, and there stood the boys, oblivious to the open door.

"Just exactly how do you hold a horseshoe when you're after a ringer?" Bob asked.

"There's nothing to it, but what I'd like to know is just how do you make a flying tackle? That must take real skill!"

Margie looked at Liz in astonishment, as Liz's face reflected her surprise, and shook her head in amazement.

"I give up," Margie breathed, "I GIVE UP!"
